On the Bridge

"I AM thankful that I live in a land where the youth of all races have a tomorrow, rather than in my native land where the youth of a race is without a tomorrow." This excerpt is taken from a prayer of thanks for America, written by a youth who has found refuge in these United States from the persecutions in his native land.

It is the prayer, too, of Adams graduates, the prayer of those who are in their youth, their Today; those who are assured of a Tomorrow to which they can turn with hope and courage.

Wealth and fame may not be theirs; hunger and pain may be their lot. But they have a Tomorrow which is their American heritage; thus they are determined to do all in their power to assure those who follow that they, too, will have the heritage which is the God-given right of the free-born.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SKIPPER

Dear Boys and Girls:

We hear a great deal these days about the need of planning. Planned cities, planned agriculture, planned economics are widely discussed. Nowhere, however, is planning more important than in education and the departure from our school this term of the largest graduating class in our history is a reminder that we must all soon face decisions that call for careful and intelligent planning long in advance.

Diplomas are issued for a variety of subject programs and they are not always assurance of individual preparation for work or for higher studies. They are rarely such assurance for those who have drifted through their high school work without giving serious thought to the goal toward which they should direct their efforts. While the number of graduates of this type is undoubtedly small as measured against the great majority of their classmates, their situation is a serious one and it is with the hope that others who are to remain at school a while longer may be saved from a similar plight that these few words about the need of carefully planning our schooling have been written.

The career that we hope to make our life work will largely dictate our choice of subjects and the demands that this vocation will make in formal schooling, in habits of work, and in personal qualities cannot too soon be familiar to us. Each college, each school of higher studies, each occupation has its own requirements and the sooner we know these and plan our school work in accordance with them, the better it will be for us in learning to make a living. We can hardly begin to plan at too early a stage in our high school work.

All of us face other demands that are especially urgent for the free citizens of a democracy. We must learn to live as well as to make a living and this means living together in friendly and helpful cooperation with our fellows. There is every evidence that this lesson has been well learned and practiced by the students of our school and we may look confidently to the manner in which they will conduct themselves as adult members of the community of which they form so important a part. Let us hope that they have developed no less surely the ability clearly to see and courageously to serve what is true and what is right. No planning can mean more for the present and future happiness of our students than such clearness of vision, generosity of impulse, and firmness of purpose.

May the members of our latest class possess these important qualities in highest measure!

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM A. CLARKE

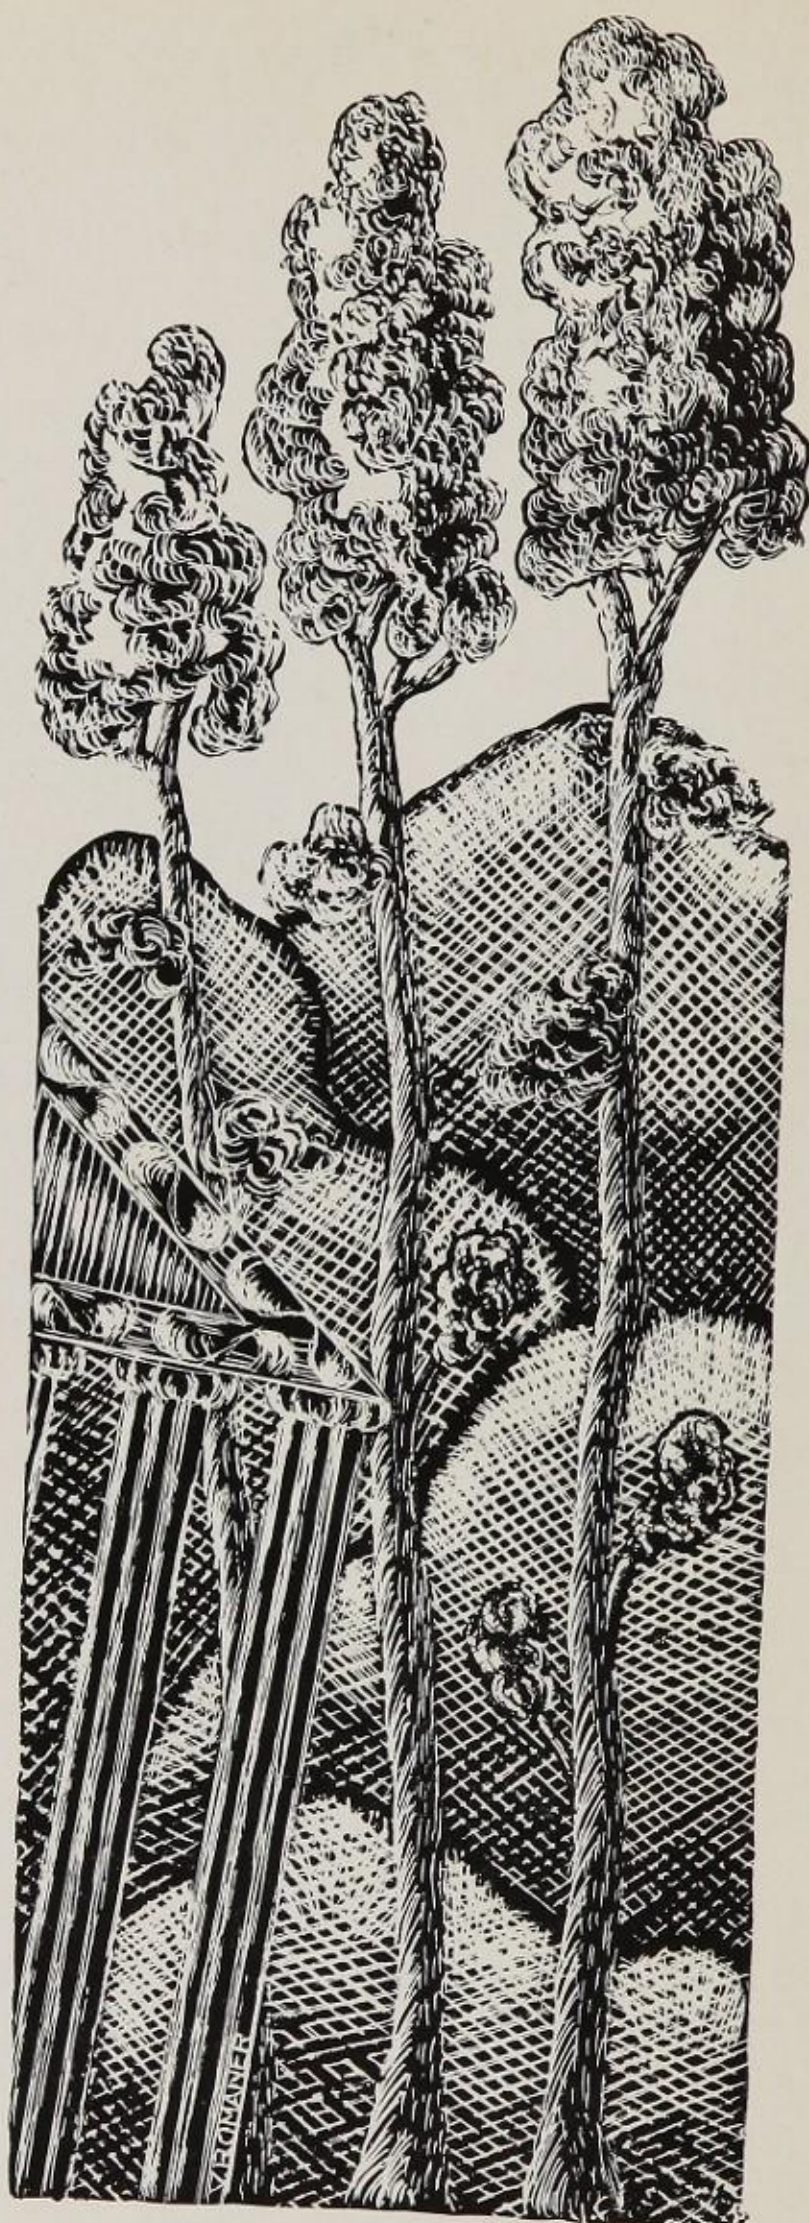

THE TURN IN THE ROAD

ENID ADAMY

I STOOD upon the hill, and from my perch I saw, gleaming through the shadowed foliage of the screening trees, a temple—tall and white and wondrously fashioned. Massive carven portals saw I, and pillars of marbled cream.

And through the forest green there ran a narrow band of twisted ribboned road. But in this road there was a bend, and at the bend was slashed the ribbon, and where before one road there was, now were there many.

O'er this broad highway had passed before the men of fame and power. The strong and the weak had trod that lengthy way. And when the bend was reached, each paused in his turn, chose his path and traveled on—alone and unafraid.

THANK YOU ADAMS

MAXINE WECHSLER

Dear John Adams:

I'M quite out of breath as I write this. You see, these last few days have been quite taken up with packing in preparation for my return home. It was only with the greatest difficulty that I managed to stuff Senior Day and then Class Night, into a trunk already crowded with memories. Now, it's only a matter of making room for a few Exams, Commencement, and then I can turn the lock. But there's something else—

It has become the custom, at the termination of a visit, to write a "bread and butter letter" to your host. The purpose of this letter is to give thanks for the hospitality shown me. John Adams, I say in all sincerity, that my sojourn with you has been more than merely pleasant; it has represented four of the happiest years of my life.

Four years ago, I received an invitation to attend a house party. I laugh now, when I recall the awe and wonder with which I first gazed at your huge estate. I was, oh, so eager to enter, to become a part of your household.

The first few days went very quickly. I recall admiring the way you invited a new group every so often, while the rest of us moved up one grade in your affections. (I felt sorry for those who had to leave each term.)

You certainly entertained your guests royally. I believe your activities could be compared with those of a large hotel. You planned social functions, parties, dances, variety shows, and grand assembly programs. And you couldn't do enough for me if I sought some particular type of amusement. There were Art, Science, Language, Athletic, and Cultural groups galore. During the various seasons, you provided baseball, football, basketball, and track teams of which I was very proud.

Then, if that wasn't enough, you had advisers in charge of each activity. Here was an opportunity for extra instruction, helpful advice, and a chance to further my friendship with a great many fine men and women whom I might never have really known.

If hospitality has anything to do with eating, then "you've got something there!" The main dining room was clean, spacious, and certainly provided healthful, tasty foods. In the last few months of my stay, you injected great variety as far as the menu was concerned, what with two kinds of milk, and several types of ice cream, classified according to flavor, size, and shape.

And the work we did—Lest I become lazy and waste time, you provided excellent instruction, well-illuminated, ventilated classrooms, and the finest equipment imaginable. I was able to take advantage of new textbooks, scientific apparatus, and all kinds of machinery from typewriters to sewing machines. I was even under the guidance of a special adviser who assisted me in planning for that inevitable day when I would have to take my leave.

There were among my fellow-guests some ambitious individuals who desired to do something other than study. We had the choice of becoming musicians, writers, actors, athletes, or members of numerous squads and office staffs.

I found myself in the Publications Office where I became acquainted with the finest "bunch" I have ever known. Here was my opportunity to reciprocate, to show you that I was really anxious to do my part. I wrote for The Campus, the news organ in which there were recorded the daily happenings, and special activities that kept the party going. My favorite "haunt" was the "pubs" office. There was some indefinable attraction that made me spend there every possible moment I could spare. I enjoyed all the confusion, the noise, the excitement that signified that work was being done.

Another favorite "haunt" was the library. You know, not every home contains so large and fine a library as is to be found in a home such as yours. Here I used to spend hours browsing among best sellers, old favorites, the latest and newest in fiction, poetry, and drama.

In an effort better to acquaint us with the library, your guides took us through it, and showed us where to find the numerous types of books to be found there. Even the library has grown since first I saw it. At the end of your next house party, you'll probably find it necessary to take the whole third floor of your home for the library itself.

The days that our parents were invited to attend a special event like Open House were full of fun. With pride, we took them through the whole house. On one occasion a visitor remarked that your home was as efficient as a busy factory, and she wondered how we kept things going at so large a party. We modestly attributed this to our cooperation, because we knew that such cooperation brought about more good times.

And now, lest I wear out my welcome, I leave the security, the comfort of your home to become, perhaps, a guest at another house party. Perhaps I shall see my newly-made friends again at these parties. If not, I shall not be too disappointed, for if we do not chance to meet at the home of a stranger, then we'll surely meet at the reunions held at your home. I'm looking forward to these reunions.

And now, final thanks, John Adams, for the grandest, happiest, and fullest four years I've ever spent anywhere. I hope I was a good guest. You were a splendid host!

Affectionately,

Maxine Wechsler

COMES THE REVOLUTION

ROBERT KLENCK

TO see His Majesty's faithful servant, Lord Cyrus Warbleleigh, 2nd Earl of Burkeshire, during a certain 19th Century day at 10 o'clock in the morning, one would have thought that the good Earl was having an apoplectic fit. Actually he was not, and the two persons occupying space in reasonably close proximity to the peer's flushed face and blustering gibberish, evidently labored under no such supposition. One of the two was a girl, a fluffy little thing who bore a striking resemblance to the Earl. She started to speak.

"But, Father," she began, "I love George dearly." His Lordship's whiskers bristled. "Oh, you do, do you?" he roared, "and haven't I just informed you, my dear Annabelle, that you are to have definitely nothing more to do with him?"

His Lordship frothed furiously for a moment.

"For centuries," shouted Lord Warbleleigh, "our glorious name has remained untarnished. Kings, counts, earls, barons, have been privileged to bear the name. And now you—you—," The good Earl choked on an adjective. "Now you wish to unite with this common, worthless, dunderheaded ignoramus."

"Pater, please," implored the girl. "'Tis true that my George is not of noble birth, but he is of noble heart and features."

"Her" George, relaxed a little and smiled appreciatively at Annabelle.

"Noble features, bah!" sneered his Lordship. "And as for his heart, can you show me a more black-hearted knave?"

George lost control and whipped out a pocket mirror and held it in front of Lord Warbleleigh's face. The Earl forgot to bluster and stared at his reflection in fascination. The audacity of the bounder!

"And, furthermore," said George, picking up momentum, "there is only one member of the whole Warbleleigh family who isn't half-baked." He glanced tenderly at Annabelle. "You've refused to permit us to marry. Very well, we'll get married without your permission. Come, Annabelle dearest."

"I'll do nothing of the sort," said Annabelle.

"But darling—"

"I'm not your darling," pointed out Annabelle, frigidly. "After such insolence!" She flung her arms around the stem of the family. "And now, Mr. Wallace, I'll thank you to leave."

"But sweetheart—" began George, "your father called me several names with which I was not christened."

"Good day, Mr. Wallace!"

"Well, if that's the way you feel, it suits me!"

"As for you, Fatty," snarled the very vexed Mr. Wallace, "there is only one reason why you didn't burst into flames when you got hot under that celluloid collar of yours, and that's because you're all wet!"

Leaving Warbleleigh Manor in a high state of indignation and confusion as His Lordship tore through the castle in search of a towel, George stalked out. His mind was made up! He would join the foreign legion and Heaven help the Arabs if any of them was named Raz Emil Warbleleigh!

Paris and a new day, found George looking for the recruiting office. After a while, he drifted into a little Parisian tavern with a lump in his throat and ordered something to wash down the lump. Toying with the poisonous-looking liquid, the lonesome George noticed a youngish-looking man, well fortified with mustaches, also featuring a droopy countenance. He was staring moodily into his glass. George rose and shambled over to him.

"Monsieur," acknowledged the other.

George offered to buy him a drink. Five minutes later they were great friends.

"M. de Stabile," said George, "I sat by you because I was lonely and morose, and you too seemed devoid of cheer. What is your trouble?"

"I'm afflicted with a terrible malady.

I am, unfortunately, a member of the nobility."

George Wallace said very slowly, "My French is not so good, Monsieur. I don't think I quite heard you right."

"I am Viscount Hazen de Stabile, a French nobleman, and I am very bored with life. As far as I'm concerned, all the Barons, Dukes, and Earls of France might better be decorating playing cards. But what can one do? I could run away, but the king might chase me, and, besides, someone has to take charge of the affairs of the estate."

George suddenly thought a magnificent thought.

When the 2nd Earl of Burckshire and his charming daughter, Annabelle, toured Paris about three months later, they were presented at the court of the reigning Louis and received cordial invitations from one Viscount M. de Stabile to avail themselves of a few fortnights' lodging. Both His Lordship and his daughter were well pleased with the grace and dispatch of the gallant young Frenchman, and Lord Cyrus was soon speculating on the advisability of having a foreign son-in-law. One wonders if the gracious Earl would have so speculated if he had recognized the English face that smiled behind the famed De Stabile mustaches. Annabelle, however, knew. The whim of the little god with the arrows had penetrated the disguise for her.

His Lordship beamed brightly for several weeks as the "courting" went on. When the engagement was finally announced, his radiance was dazzling. He gave his blessing wholeheartedly and later that evening, when he and Annabelle were by themselves in the drawing room, Lord Cyrus said, "I'm very pleased with your Frenchman, Annabelle. His noble stock and position make him a fit bridegroom. Thank Heaven you had enough sense in that pretty head of yours to give up that scoundrel of a Wallace." Annabelle coyly smiled.

Meanwhile, a pale moon was groping morosely through the sky, and its dim light barely made discernible the outlines of a pale and sickly-looking individual who was groping through the swampy meadows that separated the de Stabile chateau from the city of Paris. It was the Viscount Hazen de Stabile who, sadly sober since his francs had run out some days before, had decided to return to the chateau and reassume his role of noble. Dragging one muddy foot after the other, he finally reached the moat surrounding the chateau.

"Baptiste!" he shouted. "Let down this bridge at once!"

A gaunt, hawk-nosed head shot up from behind the battlement, viewed with astonishment the strangely familiar figure on the other side of the moat, and let down the bridge. The head belonged to Baptiste Fauxpas, the bird-faced sentry who, a moment later, was helping the Viscount into the castle.

The situation had now reached the extenuating stage. Lord Cyrus, his noble curiosity aroused, came to find out just what the row was all about. Annabelle, fearful of some new complication, followed a bit timidly. George, who had been upstairs applying a daub of glue to his bogus mustaches, whiskered them into place and raced down the stairs, hoping to intercept the cause of the disturbance before Lord Cyrus reached the scene. But his efforts were in vain, for ere he could shoo the Viscount into a place of seclusion, His Lordship hove into view.

"I say there!" he bellowed, "What's going on?"

The Viscount looked at Lord Cyrus with a mean look in his right eye, a sty in his left. "What, my good man, is it to you?"

There was a very perceptible rise in Lord Cyrus' blood pressure. He turned, in staccato succession, from blush pink to rose, to carmine, to lobster red. Then he turned to George. "Who is this creature?" he roared.

"Who—him?" queried George. "Oh him-er—he's the—er Fuller Brush man."

"That right?" thundered Cyrus Warbleleigh.

"That's right," said George Wallace.

"That's right," said Annabelle, throwing her support to George's side.

"That ees wrong," hissed Baptiste Fauxpas. "Theese ees ze real Viscount. Zat man, he ees ze phoney."

Thereupon five things happened. Lord Cyrus turned from red to green. Baptiste poured de Stabile a drink. The Viscount drank it. George jumped out the window. Annabelle fainted.

The city of Paris, four hours after George Wallace had left the Chateau, was a hot bed of intrigue. The aristocracy were cooking up schemes to cheat the King at bingo and the peasants were cooking up schemes for a French Revolution. Citizens went about murmuring: "The Bastille must go! Down with aristocrats!"

Suddenly one citizen, Gaspard Le Blanc, bounced a brick off the Bastille wall and yelled, "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality! Let's go!" The cry was taken up by others. Guillotines were wheeled into position and the Revolution was on. Nobles were quickly aroused, and swore great angry oaths. They had a habit of losing their heads.

Only this wasn't a trivial thing. George Wallace realized this as he raced back towards the chateau.

The drawbridge was up when he arrived. "Ho!" cried he. "Flee for your lives. The citizens have revolted!" The hawknosed head that was Baptiste Fauxpas shot up. "Baptiste, you dope. Let down the bridge," yelled George.

Baptiste fixed him with an icy stare. "You are Monsieur ze Phoney. I, Baptiste Fauxpas, take no ordaire from you."

Inside the castle, the Viscount and Lord Cyrus had become fast and inebriated friends. Annabelle, after a stern lecture by her father, was locked in her room. The Viscount was narrating the escapade of "Ze three leetel peegs." "Wan leetle peeg stay home, wan leetle peeg have cognac, wan leetle peeg have none, and wan leetle peeg say Oui, Oui, Oui, all ze way home."

George knew that he had no time to lose. He retreated from Baptiste's sight, and then under cover of darkness, doubled back on his tracks and slipped silently into the murky waters of the moat. Reaching the north turret, he pulled himself up on a small ledge. A tinkling of glass, a tight squeeze, and he was in.

He came out in the hall upon which opened Annabelle's room. Playing a hunch, George knocked softly.

"Yes, who's there?" It was Annabelle's alarmed voice.

"It's me, George. Dearest, we must flee. The people of Paris have gone mad."

Annabelle opened the door, her face drawn. "What of father?" she asked.

George set his jaw. "He won't listen to reason, but we must get him out of here at all costs. The Viscount too, if we can."

The pair descended to the room in which Lord Cyrus and de Stabile were carousing. "Father, we must leave at once," announced Annabelle.

His Lordship, "Won't go. Having fine time with Vecky here," and the Viscount nodded his head.

"I'm sorry I have to do this, sirs," muttered George. Bop! Bop! With de Stabile between them and Lord Warbleleigh draped over Wallace's shoulders, Annabelle and he made for the bridge. "Here is one for you, Baptiste," declared George, and Baptiste assumed the position of a dying swan.

However, safety was not to be had as easily as all that. Guillotine-worshipping Frenchmen were shrieking for blood. George and Annabelle, half-carrying, half-dragging the other two, warily skirted jumbled patrols of citizenry. The 2nd Earl of Burkeshire and the Viscount de Stabile didn't help things much either. Narrow escapes were a franc a dozen since their spasmodic hiccoughs aroused more than one volley of musket balls and Fourth Estate inquiries.

The group made for the sea coast with the idea of boarding a boat to cross the channel thus reaching England and safety. Along about this time of the year, in certain sections of Western Europe, miracles were occurring right and left and, luckily finding a loose one floating around, George and the rest managed to reach the sea.

Getting a boat, though, was another thing. Every sea captain and row boat commander was a dyed-in-the-wool partisan of the Anti-Nobility-Head-Keeping Association and fearful of embarrassing questions, the fugitives slunk along the harbor streets with detection seemingly more imminent every moment. If they hadn't caught the 59th Street-Rue de la Paix ferry, one shudders to think of the consequences.

With the English Channel between them and the Revolution, George Wallace proposed to Annabelle. "Whatever your answer, dear," he murmured, "I'll always love you." Annabelle kissed him. "Darling," she breathed. "What in blazes is going on here?" bellowed a familiar voice. And Lord Cyrus loomed in front of them.

"Your Lordship," said George determinedly, "I wish to ask for the hand of your daughter."

A stupendous smile creased the face of Sir Cyrus. "Why, of course, my boy," he boomed heartily. "I'm proud to have you as my son-in-law."

George pinched himself. It hurt.

"I'll wager," voiced His Lordship, "that you're wondering why I acquiesced so easily. Well, I'll tell you. You know how grumpy I used to be. Well, your friend Vecky fixed me up."

George pinched himself again. It hurt again. "How, sir?"

"Sanka," said His Lordship. "No more coffee nerves for me." And Lord Cyrus Warbleleigh, 2nd Earl of Burkeshire, allowed himself the indulgence of another smile.

SARAH 'N' JANE

MARTHA LORENZ

"THERE go Sarah 'n' Jane," remarked old Tom Davis in the same matter-of-fact tone he used when he said, "Right nice weather fer plantin'."

Tom addressed himself to the only other occupant of the porch which the weather-beaten Elkenstown Post Office boasted. The gentleman, an obvious summer resident, was so absorbed in a New York newspaper that he did not hear Tom.

"Yep," Tom was saying, "them two is always together—insep'able you city folks 'ud call 'em. I wouldn't be 'tall surprised ef that's where' some folks got that name Sarah Jane; the two o' them being together so much makes a body think o' them as one."

He glanced at his unsympathetic audience, and shrugging his shoulders said, "Wal, ther's no use me wastin' my valu'ble time ef ya ain't goin' ta lissen. Good morning to ya." After which haughty speech, he marched off, chewing the stem of his pipe viciously. The gentleman continued reading, quite unaware of his faux pas.

Sarah and Jane, the object of Tom's musings, were wending their way homeward from church. Sarah was tall and dark, her step firm and her head high; Jane was short and fair, her mien and manner apologetic. Sarah was the post mistress, Jane her assistant; Sarah read the post-cards which came and went in the little post-office; Jane admired the pictures. Yet, neither was ever seen without the other. They were, as Tom so aptly put it, "insep'able."

Elkenstown, the little community in which they lived, was a typical small village. The antiquated post office, the white wooden church, the new brick school, and the two-pump gasoline station, were the "town part" of Elkenstown.

In the "better" section of Elkenstown, houses with green shutters and roofs beamed beneficently at lawns of green velvet stretched out under the spreading trees. No trim white fences boxed these lawns; they roamed at their leisure, only surrendering occasionally to the persistent cosmos, nasturtiums, and mountain pinks, roses, hydrangea and phlox.

But in Elkenstown's "poorer" section, white houses turned to brown, brown to gray, and finally gray to no color at all, where the road turned and ran parallel to the railroad tracks. Cracked and broken windows, shaky chimneys, hard-baked front yards and broken steps characterized them all.

As Sarah and Jane arrived at the many-winged house which was their home, Sarah stopped and said, "I'm going over to see how Mrs. Hansen is. You had better go in and 'tend to the chickens!"

"All right, Sarah. Tell Mrs. Hansen I was asking for her."

Jane hurried up the stairs and kissed the young girl who opened the door for her. She was Sally, their orphaned niece, whom they had raised from a child and whom they loved dearly.

"Oh, Aunt Jane," Sally said excitedly as they entered the house, "I have the grandest news to tell you."

"What is it, dear?" Jane asked, taking off her hat and gloves and leading the way to the kitchen.

"Bill did ask me to go to the dance they're giving at his college."

"There, didn't I say he would? He just couldn't help himself."

"And that isn't all. Bill says that his dean would like to have you two come as chaperones. The dean is going to write to you, but Bill just wanted to prepare you." As Jane began to protest, Sally said, "And no excuses either. This'll be a swell chance for you and Aunt Sarah to have a good time. Besides," she added playfully, "with all those professors there, you should get a lot of beaux."

"Well, I guess there's no need to ask you whether you had a good time last night," Jane said with a smile. It was the morning after the dance, and Jane, Sarah, and Sally were having a belated breakfast.

"No, indeed, I had such a perfectly grand time that I'm just riding along on clouds. And you two seemed to have a good time last night, too. Aunt Jane, you certainly made a hit with that jolly man with the—er—high forehead, and I was certainly surprised to see you step out with that distinguished-looking gentleman, Aunt Sarah."

Sarah and Jane protested, but blushed nevertheless. For a while an embarrassed silence descended upon them; presently Sarah said:

"Jane, I wonder if you would mind taking over the post office by yourself on Thursday afternoons for a few weeks. I think I had better get those treatments for my sinus, and as we don't have much to do on Thursdays, I thought it would be the best day for me to go into Sutton."

Jane looked relieved. "No, indeed," she said. "In fact, I was wondering if you would do the same on Tuesday afternoons. Those two teeth of mine are bothering me again, and I thought I had better follow Dr. Barton's advice and get them attended to, while there's still a chance that they can be treated."

Sally looked at them in surprise. "It certainly is true that wonders never cease. I never thought that I'd see the day when one of you would go any place without the other."

Four months passed by with incredible swiftness. Sally, watching the flakes of the first snowfall drift lazily to the earth, was engaged in some serious pondering. She spoke aloud to the little dog she held in her arms.

"Sailor, there are a lot of things going on around here that I can't quite cope with. Both Aunt Sarah and Aunt Jane should have been finished with their treatments a long time ago. Yet they still go to Sutton, and are evasive when I question them; for the last week or so, both of them have been worried by something. And I know that they aren't confiding in one another. Gee, pup, I sure would give a lot to know what's going on."

But Sally wasn't the only one who was mystified by the actions of Sarah and Jane. One morning, when she was standing outside of the post office, reading a letter she had just received, some one said, "Good mornin' ta ya, Sally."

Sally looked up; it was old Tom who had spoken to her.

"Good morning, Mr. Davis," she said, and would have gone back to her letter, but Tom again spoke to her.

"Beggin' ya pardon, Sally, but there's a question I wuz awonderin' ef ya could answer fer me."

"Certainly, Mr. Davis. What is it?"

"Now don't be thinkin' me a pryin' old hen, but I usta take special pride in seein' Sarah 'n' Jane together all th' time. But what has happened? Every Tuesday Jane goes ta Sutton, and every Thursday Sarah goes ta Sutton. Hev they had a fallin' out?"

"Oh, no, indeed. Aunt Jane is getting some special treatments for her teeth, and Aunt Sarah gets treatment for her sinus. As they both can't leave the post office at the same time, they go on different days."

"Well, I'm mighty glad to hear thet. Thank ya kindly, Sally." Tom walked away satisfied, but a frown creased Sally's forehead. She had explained their journeys satisfactorily to Tom, but she, herself, was bewildered by them. Why did they still go to Sutton? She could find no answer for the question.

However, if Sally would have seen two letters which left the Elkensville Post Office a short time later, perhaps some of her wonderment would have been dispelled.

One letter read, "Mr. James Riley, My dear Sir, I have seriously considered your proposal, and as much as I would like to accept it, I'm afraid that my duty is to remain with my sister. She and I have been constant companions, and I cannot desert her now. I thank you for the pleasant times we have had, but I think it would be best if we discontinued them. I hope that you will always think kindly of me. Sincerely yours, Sarah Willoby."

The contents of the second letter were: "Dear Peter, I am terribly sorry, but I feel that I must reject your proposal. For the past twenty years, my sister and I have always been together, and it wouldn't be fair to leave her now when she needs me most. I thank you for your generosity and kindness, and regret that my decision makes it impossible for me to continue our pleasant outings. Yours sincerely, Jane Willoby."

Old Tim stamped his feet and slapped his hands together to warm them. He was standing on the porch of the post office and was speaking to one of his neighbors.

"Ther' go Sarah 'n' Jane," he remarked in the same matter of fact tone he used when he said, 'Guess ther'll be snow tomarra.' Fer a while they seemed ta be driftin' apart, but it sure is good ta see them insep'able agin."

SOMEWHERE nearby, the warning, resounding clash of a gong, reaches Bob's ears. "The Kid" rises to his feet, and with his arms and fists well up, his jaw set determinedly, and his eyes gleaming narrowly, he advances slowly. It seems to Bob that his opponent's whole body is covered by his comparatively small and thin arms.

The great crowd all about them roars its approval, and "The Kid" lashes out with a short, fast, hard left which catches our hero on the chest. He laughs shortly, and returns a terrific right to the jaw. His opponent staggers backward, regains his balance, shakes his head, and once more comes back. The crowd shouts as Bob is knocked from his feet by a left to the right side of his face, and another to his right eye.

His brain reeling, and his eyesight blurred, Bob attempts to regain his feet. With a terrific physical effort, he rises and immediately falls into a clinch with his opponent. As they separate, our hero thinks of his mother. What would she say? He must emerge victorious. He cannot again be reduced to the status of the has-been. His head must always remain above the general mass of humanity. The thought recurs to him: what about his mother? What will she do?

With this reflection in mind, Bob feints, spars, counters, again and again. He wards off terrific punches aimed for all parts of his body. Again he unleashes rights and lefts to "The Kid's" body and face. "The Kid" is down! No, he's up! His eyes are full of tears brought forth by a blow to the bridge of his nose. He is unable to see. "The Kid" is swinging wildly, blindly, almost hysterically, and Bob feels sorry for him now.

Our hero strikes repeatedly with short, fast rights and lefts, and "The Kid" finally drops to his knee, and then falls.

The bellowing of the spectators seems far away as Bob vaguely, almost as in a dream, perceives a tall man approach, help "The Kid" to his feet, and lead the victor to his seat. His voice is barely audible above the babbling and applause of the thousands of people.

"Well done, Bobby-Boy. That child should not have tried to take your seat on this pile of boxes. You have just as much right to see the parade."

PITCHERS DO HIT

LEO HAMALIAN

THERE is a select circle of pitchers in the baseball industry gifted with the indispensable knack of breezing the horsehide past either the gloves or bats of the opposing nine with equal adroitness, thus evincing the need of revising the rather blunt phrase, "Pitchers don't hit."

Hitting pitchers, or "double-duty men," as their bifarious ability often causes them to be dubbed, present a tough problem to the enemy, for they complete the proverbial "nine-man line-up" and afford the rival moundsmen little or no opportunity to slacken the stiff pace they are forced to maintain.

One such hurler is Charlie "Red" Ruffing, of the New York Yankees, who feels as much at home in the batter's box as he does in the pitcher's. A strapping giant of six feet some, two missing digits on his left foot is the only reason "Red" does not patrol the outfield between turns at mound duty. Charlie clouts a long, sizzling ball and has often been pressed into pinch-hitting service by Joe McCarthy, not because the Yank manager suffers from a shortage of pinch-swingers, but because Charlie is a good bet to "score that man on third" with a timely

Last year, the Nokomis, Illinois, red-head seemed to think his work as "Number One Minute Man" of the Ruppert Rifles was worthy of at least a one-thousand dollar salary raise, but Mr. Jacob Ruppert, who owns the key to the Yankee coffers, looked at matters in a different light, so Charlie broke all hold-out records by refusing to sign a contract for a month of the baseball season. He didn't get the $1,000 immediately, but his phenomenal performances during the season gained him the disputed sum at the close of the campaign as a bonus. Incidentally, Charlie collected three hits in five tries against the Giants in the World Series, which contributed greatly to the downfall of the two southpaw aces, "Mickey Mouse" Melton and Carl Hubbell.

However, his true prowess with the bludgeon is perhaps best demonstrated by a game with the Washington Senators three years ago. Charlie was twirling the game of his life, and the scoreboard was silent evidence of this with a double row of goose-eggs for eight and one-half innings of play. In the last of the ninth, with the score 0-0, two out, nobody on the sacks, Charlie stepped up to the plate and drove a prodigious homer into the stands, winning his own game, 1-0.

Another clansman of the twirling tribe who commands high respect for his thunderous batting power is Wesley Ferrell, the temperamental Washington veteran. Wes's slugging average is generally far up in the .300 brackets and at the present writing his hitting ability appears to be as valuable to his club as his pitching. Two years ago, he consistently collected his usual quota of twenty victories, but since then he has hit a downgrade and has failed to hop off it.

One afternoon last season, while still enlisted on the Red Sox roster, he pitched the initial game of a twin bill with the Browns, and set the winning runs across the plate with a ninth-inning double. In the second encounter, his pinch-triple with two mates on board, gave the Bostons a double victory. He also helped himself to a single and four-bagger in the first game. He seldom fails to hit less than six home-runs per season, which is splendid stickwork, considering the number of games in which he participates and the chances he faces of being driven to the showers. Wes is expected to riddle many a pitcher's shut-out efforts this season with his talented achievements with the warclub.

St. Lawrence University's gift to the diamond, "Prince Hal" Schumacher, the Giants' sinker-ball specializer, also wields a dexterous and dangerous bat, which has spoiled many a magnificent pitching exhibition at the Polo Grounds. Under the astute tutelage of Mister William Terry, the Pride of the Press, the combination of Hal's strong throwing arm and adept work with the willow, present intriguing potentialities of converting him into an exceptional outfielder, should the much rumored trouble with his right shoulder ever develop into a serious matter.

Young, wiry, and keen-eyed, Hal has the reputation of being a very troublesome customer for enemy pitchers. He refuses to bite at the bad ones, doesn't fish for an outside hook, murders a fast one down the middle, and wastes little time starting for first base. It is no unusual distinction for Hal to smash a brace of home-runs in one game, for he has done it five times in his big league career. However, Terry seldom uses Schumie for pinch-hitting, as he has such able batters as Leslie and Berger sitting on the bench.

Then, of course, there can be no forgetting the greatest hitting pitcher of all times, the old Bambino, the big gun of the '29 Bronx Bombers, the Man Who Built the Stadium—Babe Ruth himself.

Like the old Viking sagas, the tales of his batting feats have been sung and re-sung by the soothsayers of swat, so we can skip lightly over the Babe's accomplishments by simply saying he was the best thing that ever hit the game—or a ball, too. His mound wizardry, although not very highly publicized, led the Red Sox to a world's championship back in his hey-day. During his last active year with the Yanks, he faced the Red Sox in the closing clash of the season and turned them back to the tune of 6-5, showing there was still life in the old guy.

"Red" Lucas, the burly, carrot-topped Pirate hurler, has seen much action in the picket line during the past three seasons, so skilfully has he handled himself at the plate. He still does a fair job of tossing the horsehide, considering his thirty-six years.

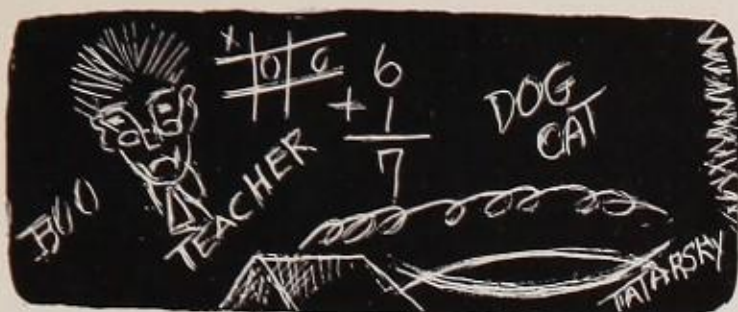

Monte Pearson, of the Yanks, is great shucks at plastering the pill, and he is never removed for a pinch-hitter in the tight spots. Carl Hubbell does a fair job of batting and Bud Parmelee, formerly of the Clubs, was also rather proficient at the art of hammering the horsehide.

"Schoolboy" Rowe won many of his own games with his timely hits, and Freddie Fitzsimmons of the Dodgers also manages to get on the sacks once in a while. Van Mungo is a powerful swinger and has a standing bet with Vernon Gomez that he will bat 100 points higher than the Goofy one every season. He is often used to pinch-hit.

Johnny Marcum, the husky farmer-pitcher of the Red Sox, whacked the ball viciously while with the Athletics, but lost some of his powdering power soon after his transfer to the Yawkey outfit. Nothing delights him more than "gittin' his lick", and when he catches the ball fairly on the nose, it's labeled "four-master" in any park in the country, including Yellowstone. Many a time "John has spoke for himself" at the plate, or at least his old wagontongue has, and the center-fielder generally had to employ a cab to retrieve the ball.

This goes to show that "pitchers don't hit" is one of the popular misconceptions of modern baseball. When you are cheering your favorite club on to victory, and the enemy pitcher arrives at the plate with claymore in hand, refrain from hollering, "He can't hit the side of a barn from the inside," for he may cross you up and do just that from the outside—especially if the barn is about 350 feet away.

MY

THERE it was . . . to be seen, admired and ridiculed. Miss Smith, the second grade teacher, entered. There on the board was her person. Spectacles, bun and ankle-length skirt. The guilty culprit? Oh! All knew pigtailed Mary Baxter was the guilty one. Miss Smith indignantly demanded, "Who did this?"

"He" sat in the third row, third seat, and was in an agony of terror, for Mary was the love of his life, and his heart bled for her. Here was a chance to prove his everlasting love. Perhaps now she would give him an encouraging glance.

Squaring his shoulders, he stood up determinedly and with a knightly air said, "I did, Miss Smith." Glancing at him severely, the teacher said, "Report to me in the principal's office." He smiled. What was there to be feared? He would go through fire and water to prove his devotion to that celestial being.

He marched directly to the principal's office after the first bell. Miss Smith entered with that certain step which foreboded ill to her charges. The sharp rap of the ruler could be heard distinctly.

There was a picture on the wall. He gazed at it intensely. Not a sound did he utter through the ordeal.

In his heart was the exultation of the righteous. He was the conquering hero. Surely she must see his worth now. A scrubby hand ineffectually rubbed at the signs of his recent confinement. Perhaps he could catch sight of Mary, even now, and then the sun would again shine in his life.

After the punishment, he marched with beating heart to the classroom. Down the steps, across the hall, through the doorway and . . . But her back was to him . . . two crisp pigtailed stuck at mischievous angles . . . there on the board was an unmistakable caricature of himself! She stood surveying her handiwork with a wicked giggle. He turned hastily as she looked up.

He found himself stumbling down the steps of the building. With blinded eyes and a sharp ache in his chest. Turning neither left nor right, heedless of friendly greetings, he strode as best he could straight to the back of his garage. There to sorrow at will, for this, the first blight of his young life, and to be consoled by the moist kisses of "Blackie."

THE HOLY CITY

EMANUEL FEINGOLD

WHEN the sun rises over Jerusalem, it looks over a city unlike any other in the world; a city holy to three religions: to the Jews, the Christians, and the Moslems; a city built upon solid rock; a city old when the Crusades were still an idea, but a city which is one of the most modern in the world, because it is the newest. The prevalent idea that Jerusalem is a city of narrow, dirty streets is erroneous. Only one third of the city can really be called the Old Quarter and this is partially segregated by walls.

In such a hot country as Jerusalem, where it does not rain for six months during the summer, the problem of obtaining a good water supply is uppermost. It was solved before the World War by having the houses built with flat roofs and rain would flow off the drainpipes leading to the cellars which were used for cisterns. The solid rock foundation made this possible. There was a window at the top of the cellar which served three purposes. First it permitted excess water to overflow into the streets; second it was a means of getting the water out with a bucket. The third use was unintentional. The window permitted animals to enter and they would drown. The people had no means of knowing when this occurred, so they often drank polluted water which resulted in the prevalence of malaria.

A wealthy Australian woman determined to help the city and volunteered financial aid to build a sanitary water system. She obtained permission from the Turkish officials at Constantinople. When she arrived in Jerusalem with the necessary permission, she was received very coldly by the Turkish officials and they kept delaying action even though she had money ready. She finally gave up and later learned that the reason for their coldness was the fact that she had not given them what they called "back-sheesh", which is Turkish for bribe.

When Lord Allenby decided to attack the city of Jerusalem by land in 1917, he found that the main drawback was the absence of fit drinking water. Therefore, he built a water system from Kantara East, which is on the Suez canal, Egypt, over the Sinia Peninsula to Vaad-El-Arish. When this water first flowed into Jerusalem, it resulted in a stampede similar to our gold rush.

The problem was still not solved, however, because in the Old Quarter people insisted upon using the cellar water for drinking purposes. The Public Health Department sent inspectors to place chemicals in this water to render it unfit for human consumption.

This greatly reduced malaria, as did the system of mission hospitals set up by the Catholic missionaries in the principal cities, including Jerusalem, Jaffa, Tiberias, and Saffed. Here medical care was given without discrimination. Now much of the work is done by the Hadassah, a Jewish Organization, which has set up medical centers equal to those of any in the world. Because of its efforts, malaria was almost completely wiped out, and it remained for only one more thing to eradicate the disease entirely.

This great factor in wiping out malaria completely was the Eucalyptus tree which was introduced from Australia. The Arabs call the tree "El-Sedzera-El-Yahoude", which means the Jewish tree. The trees removed the cause of malaria. One of the best examples of this is Chedera, which was a noted malaria center, and after the trees were planted it became a health resort. While we are discussing water, it is interesting to note that one of the newest industries of Jerusalem is fishing, because under Turkish domination the people were taxed for each fish which they caught, so they did not fish. Now the tax has been removed, hence the increase in fishing.

The greatest industry of the entire country is the raising of citrus fruits, in which old Jerusalem and the rest of Palestine excel.

A friend of mine, to whom I am greatly indebted for much of the information presented here, related this anecdote about the introduction of grapefruit.

"I entered a restaurant in Jerusalem before the war with a friend to get some breakfast," he said, "and he did the ordering for both of us. When the waiter came, he set something before me which I took to be half a lemon, so I asked the waiter what the idea was, and he explained that it was a grapefruit and told me how to eat it."

Evening in Jerusalem seems to hold all the wisdom of the ages. It is exceptionally quiet, and the stillness is broken only occasionally by the laugh of a hyena or the call of a jackal.

And so we say goodbye to Jerusalem, land of mysticism, and leaving, we breathe a fervent prayer that the Holy City may once more resume its quiet way as it has through the centuries.

THOSE WOMEN

When first the world was hewn,
It came out rather well,
However, one mistake was made
Which I shall shortly tell.

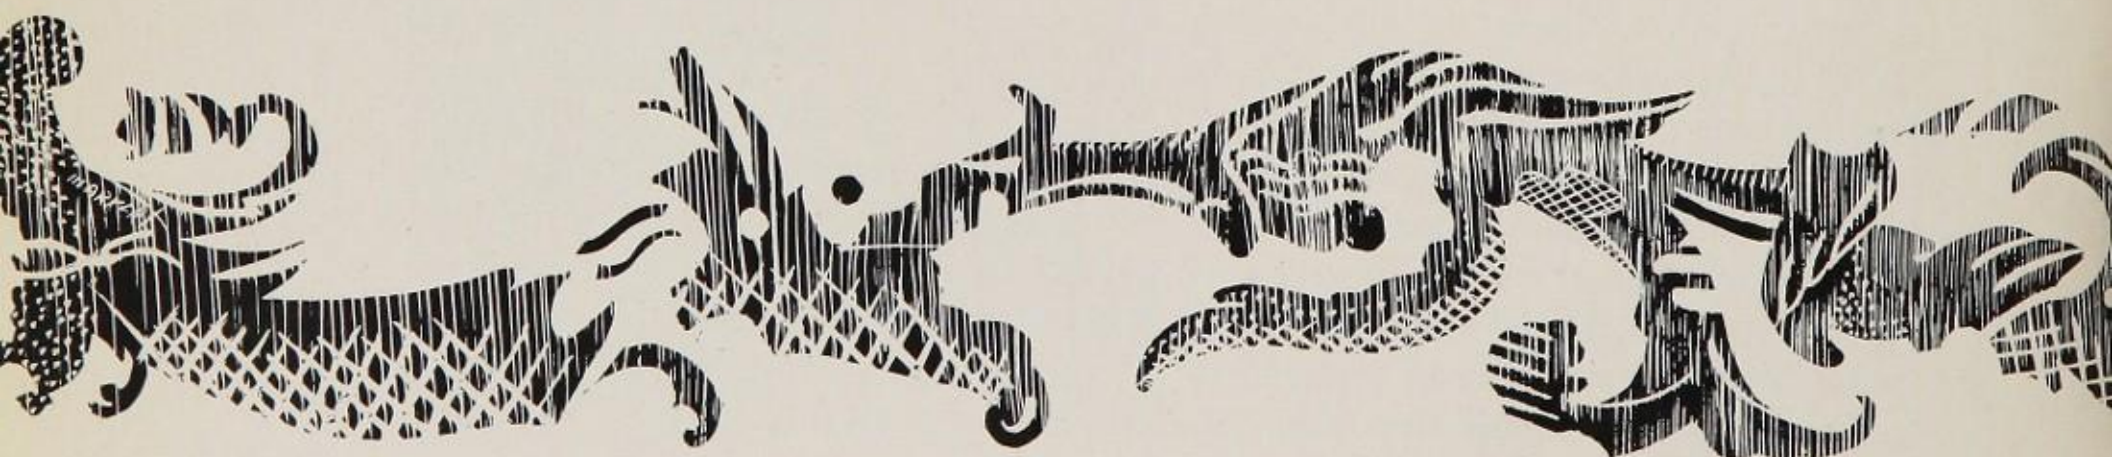

The first man made was Adam,
He enjoyed his life
Till God removed his rib
And changed it to a wife.

And then his troubles all began,
Great sorrow was his lot,
And just because Eve ate some fruit,
Was driven from the spot.

So Adam suffered a great deal
Through no fault of his own,
'Cause Eve by trying to be good
Would not let him alone.

And so it goes throughout the years,
E'er since the world began,
It's always been traditional
For woman to plague man.

Irving Gruber

THOSE MEN

A chap named Gruber 'cross the page,
Makes statements strong and rash.
But he's only done what males oft do
He's said a lot of trash.

Girls, to the ramparts we must go
Woman's honor to defend,
By shooting straight and to the point
We'll rout those things called men.

Women are a plague, he's said
And since Eve, men've had 'em.
Why, if it weren't for harmless Eve
Who'd e'er have heard of Adam.

Look now, behind History's great men,
Delve long and deep and true,
You'll find there always was a woman
And so those words he'll rue.

ARRUM

MARGARET CARLEY

THE traveler passing by Arrum would see in it simply a replica of the tiny, struggling, fishing hamlets dotting the coast with their whitewashed cottages of the fisherfolk. Yet Arrum is a locus for sightseers and artists to gather—mainly because of its strange sea phenomena.

The shore line was cut with jagged rocks, jealously guarding their posts, cutting and plunging viciously through each roll of the sea. The waters were restless and ruffled, wandering along the coast with an uneasy rumbling, as the waves whipped, spit, and sang against the rocks. Above, thin gray gulls hovered over gray waters with raucous cries of greed. Despite this sign of life, the scene seemed desolate and somehow unhealthy. Yet, it was not this that distinguished Arrum's coast from any other in this region. It was Arrum's "Witching Hour" that made the ignorant inhabitants shun the place after their last nets were gathered.

At twelve o'clock each night, the tide changed, and it was at this hour that the ugly little bay went through its strange metamorphosis. For hours, the waters had been steadily leaving the bay until now many rocks were bare of their wet, cold blankets. It was then, before the waters rushed back impetuously over the tired bay, that the change occurred.

Although no crescent appeared in the sky, a light yellow mist began to seep over the surface. It seemed to illuminate rather than cloud the atmosphere, and brought into sharp relief the rocks covered with tiny crystal drops that trickled down their sides like perspiration. The ocean itself had changed from a lifeless gray to a clear, glassy green, emitting tiny crackles as bubbles which had been clinging to the ocean floor shot up to the surface and burst. Silver strands and waving tentacles of marine life swayed through the water, giving it an unreal, half ethereal appearance. The surface of the sea moved with a barely perceptible motion, shooting back rays of light into the mist.

The waters at the base of the rocks swirled slightly while the rocks themselves changed from yellow to pale green and then back to yellow. Weird shadows of the sea life swarming below reflected upon the stone masses, making the grotesque lights flicker.

In about a quarter of an hour, the light slowly faded, and the sea creatures scurried for shelter under the rocks. The sea became a gray and roughened mass, and began its slow march toward the shore. The rocks slowly sank into the surface of the sea, for the "Witching Hour" had gone, and with it, the magic of Arrum.

A POUND OF BUTTER

MARTHA LORENZ

Alice Biglowe glanced at the square blue and white enameled clock on the wall. It was twenty minutes to six. She went to the window, raised the sash, and searched the street below. No one in sight who could go to the store for her, just when she needed the butter so badly!

The boiling potatoes sent her scurrying to the stove, and as she lowered the flame she called, "Jackie, Jackie, where are you?"

"Here, Mom. I'm coming."

Jackie came racing into the kitchen, shouting, "High-O Silver," and slapping his hand on his side.

"Jackie, I need some butter. Will you be a good little boy and get it for me? Here's the money. Now watch at the crossing, and don't talk to anyone you don't know." She took him to the door, and kissing him said again, "Don't forget. Be very careful, dear."

"Oh, mummy," he said plaintively, "you worry so. You sent me to the store twice before, and then came after me. Promise me, on your word of honor, that you won't come after me."

"I won't, dear."

"Nope, promise me first."

"All right, I promise on my word of honor."

Swaggering importantly, Jackie descended the stairs, the steady clump, clump of his little feet fading away as he reached the hall below. Alice went back to the kitchen. Immediately, remorse filled her. She saw her darling under the wheels of a car. She saw him in the clutches of some fiend. Jackie was so small and trusting, yet all-important for all his five years.

Alice looked at the clock. Five to six. Oh, why didn't he come. Something had happened to him, she was sure. She started for the door, but half-way there, she stopped. She had made a promise and she couldn't break it. Jackie could never respect her if she didn't keep her oath.

She glanced at the clock again. Even the second hand seemed to be stationary. Her eyes burned, her head felt queer, and she felt numb. Oh, why had she ever let him go alone? She paced back and forth, the dinner neglected, wringing her hands. She knew that something had happened to him. What would she ever tell Jack? He would condemn her the rest of his life. How could she ever face anyone again? The doorbell rang.

She pressed the buzzer and breathed, "Oh, God, they're coming to tell me."

She moved to the door on leaden feet. Hesitantly she opened it. She gasped and dropped to her knees, clutching a little form in her arms.

"Oh, my baby," she sobbed, "you're safe."

COLLEGE? YES!

SCHILLING

MODERN youth cries out — "What good is a college degree? The only job I can get is that of a soda jerker, or an elevator boy." During a period of unemployment, this may be the immediate truth. Nevertheless, it has been proven that he will be above the high school graduate after ten years of endeavor. Five years ago, a young man graduated from John Adams. He was eager for work, and traveled south to operate a series of hotels. For years he tried to learn the business, but he could not compete with other managers of college training. Their minds were more intellectually broadened than his. Realizing his need of further education, he decided to take a college course in hotel management.

Many positions which require a knowledge of our social and economic forces are open to college graduates. A city editor related the history of his favorite cub reporter. She was deeply interested in journalism and secured a position on his newspaper after graduating from high school. Through her ambition and ability, she elevated herself to foreign correspondent, but was unable to compete with reporters who had gone to college. Her writings lacked the full understanding of the motives behind the Nazi purpose or the Spanish Civil War. She, too, realized that a fuller education was essential for her success.

A wider education makes for a fuller life with wider interests, and it enables people to enter new, specialized fields. Good opportunities lie in advertising. If you possess any aptitudes in designing, or salesmanship, a college course will train you to use them beneficially. Today not only women, but men too, specialize in beauty culture.

Young women who wish to devote their lives to social welfare must study psychology, economics, sociology, the arts, music and the theatre. Lillian Wald, the founder of the House on Henry Street, was a stirring example of a fully educated social worker.

Do you need more evidence to be convinced that a college education is greatly beneficial to all of us? Be not prejudiced, but open your eyes to the swiftly moving progress of which you are to be so vital a part.

TWENTY-EIGHT

AS the spider spins his web, so we weave the intricate pattern of our life. Upon graduation from High School, we are faced with a momentous question: what is our next step to be? If we are desirous of a professional career, our footsteps will follow the path of higher education. On the other hand, if through the lack of interest or financial resources, we find our thoughts turning to other fields, we should attempt to develop these particular talents. There are a great number of resources open to the newly-graduated student which may appeal to him.

The commercial world today, in which journalism, photography, business, and aeronautics are the major interests offers a large field to the willing and to the industrious. The field of aviation can never have enough men like Wiley Post and Charles A. Lindbergh. Lindbergh, who is hailed as one of the foremost aviators of his time, began his career in the Army Air School Corps and entered the Mail Service. Finally with the history-making flight of "The Spirit of St. Louis", he won everlasting fame and recognition.

There is a very large opening in the field of photography these days. The people who go around clicking candid cameras find that their knowledge is of much value. There are schools in which one may study the art of photography. If you are interested in photography, you can make your hobby a profession.

Outside of the business world, the civil service offers numerous advantages and opportunities to the graduate as do the new sciences which have been lately introduced.

The Civil Service offers to students the opportunity of a secure position with municipal, state or federal government with a pension after retirement. Scientific discovery has uncovered vast fields of research and investigation, all attainable by high school graduates.

Experience, however, is an old but wise teacher. Therefore, associate with new people, travel, read good books—these will all tend to awaken you to the possibilities of this modern world.

There is no need to feel that without a college degree, the outside world has no place for you. Remember, youth is on the march to keep the wheels of progress running in its most efficient manner. Your success in your particular choice depends entirely upon you.

SHOVING

OFF

For four years we've been residents
Of a town—John Adams by name,
But no longer are we its citizens;
For we move on—to wealth and fame.

But to those who have helped us on our way,
Tokens of our appreciation we're leaving.
First—to John Adams that athletic field
For which we've long been grieving.

To Mr. Clarke our principal,
The Skipper of our ship
We leave a rudder straight and true
To guide the Clipper's trip.

To Miss Keller a class of student lambs
Who will stay right in the fold;
To Miss Smith a group of lovely girls
Who'll get medicals when they're told.

To Mr. Patterson we leave
Classes which never crowded shall be;
To Mr. Confoy homemade cake
For the boys he invites to tea.

Miss Laws and Mr. Tobias showed
An endless amount of knowledge,
In planning all our primary cards
For entrance needs to college.

To Mr. Sullivan we leave a staff
That will always meet the deadlines,
And to Dr. Cusack an actor troupe
Who will some day make the headlines.

Whene'er we think of Household Arts
Mrs. Lyons will be the symbol;
Should these same thoughts to English turn
We'll think of Mr. Zimbal.

To Mr. Froehlich, genii
Who really know their Math.;
To Mr. Scarlata a track team
Which'll burn up the cinder path.

To Mr. Goldfield a vote of thank
For all the work he's done;
To Mr. Yourman we leave
A half-way decent pun.

To Mr. Piatti an audience
All lovers of Strauss and Puccini,
To Miss Berner a group of singers
Who carol like Moore and Martini.

To Senor Gonzales with his contagious grin
A phonograph recording of "Tipi Tipi Tin";
To a famed French lady, Miss Jones (ma'm'selle)
Students who ne'er will mix que with lequel.

To the Freshmen we're leaving a bit of advice—
Get into the swing from the start;
And we're requesting the all-important Sophs
For John Adams to do their part.

To the Juniors we leave our fondest hopes
For success on their third lap;
And we hope that the Seniors will get
Those long-wished for gown and cap.

And now we take our leave
Encouraged by your pennants;
You've been the ideal landlord
We've tried to be good tenants.

For we're off to new adventures
Talents cased in little jars
When we know they're really needed
We'll fling them to the stars.

SHIP'S COMPANY

WELL, sailors and sailorettes, after four years of bucking trade winds and calms, that staunch square rigger, the Clipper, has dropped anchor in the port of Adams again.

Their round the world cruise has taken the passengers to groups of islands and other wondrous places. Some of these prodigious islands are commonly called Eng., Chem., Eco., Bugs and Geom islands. There are also other groups which have yet to be exploited and thoroughly mapped out.

It has been a man-sized job to chart the course through the reefs and corals surrounding these and others which were visited by the group. After each voyage it has been the custom to honor the more celebrated members of the crew in the Clipper room of the Adams hotel. Below is a list of the celebrities of the evening:

Miss Adams pats her hair in place
And dons her sweetest smile.
"Look at the birdie. That's the way.
Now hold that pose a while."

The shutter snaps. The work is done.
Miss Adams leaves her perch.
She's going out to meet the world
And for her fortune search.

With head held high, eyes straight ahead,
She's going on to fame.
The farthest corners of the earth
Will soon resound her name.

She typifies all that is good
Within John Adams' gate.
Behind her she will leave her stamp,
"The Class, June Thirty-eight."

When in the history of the world
She'll play a mighty part,
Despite her fame, she'll not forget
'Twas here she got her start.

Some of the best athletes known. (I know many
Mike Klocansky
F.S.C.

"Good evening, folks, all o'er the world;
This is George Norwig talking.
The old Town Hall is packed tonight
With stars—and are they corking!

LANDFALL

"When it comes to disregarding rules
In the race to lead all residents,
We see Miss Mildred Cleary,
The first of women presidents.

"A staff of active workers
Is headed by Miss "Mill"
The most outstanding of these are
Mr. Santopolo—he fits the bill.

"Then Sam Williams and Miss Whiting,
Their silence seems forlorn,
But just the opposite of them
Are Miss Dittmar and Osborne.

"There are Sir Power and Miss Washburn
Who have appeared on all our stages,
With them are Klenck and Miss Lorenz
Who have edited our front pages.

"Do you hear that loud applause?
Well, the crowd is just milling
Around the cleverest citizens
Lou Dougherty and Miss Schilling.

"And do you hear the strains of opera
Coming from the Music Hall?
'Tis Osborne and Lustgarten
Playing "Martha," loved by all.

"Then we shall go to the ball;
To miss it would be a crime,
For we'll see some fancy stepping,
John and Jeanie in their prime.

"S. Williams (The S. stands for Success)
With Evelyn B. a new approach he's tryin'
While Ryan is femme-surrounded
And keeps the girls a-sighin'!

"Panzarella and Miss Duffy
Make smiles their only haven.
Outstanding for their taste in dress,
Are Miss Newton and Cliff Craven.

"The artists in attendance
Are Galinsky and John Ryan.
Though Sheffield has done much for us
To do more he is tryin'.

"Carbone and Ricca, of Olympic fame
Are also here tonight,
And Liesegang and Miss Miester
Help cheer us up a mite.

"Now Dot Dreher is with Ryan
Aren't they dignified though?
Those two bards are with them too,
The famed Bob and Miss Pleau.

"And finally we have Miss Wechsler
Whose quips bewilder poor Mr. Wood.
Haven't they all made us proud?
Just as we knew they could.

"Well, folks, the show is over
And everyone has gone
But the fame of those we met
Will keep going on and on.

"But I'm sure we all voice a hope
That those who weren't here
Have also had their share
Of success, fame and cheer."

Tommy, dear: 6-29-38
No matter the course, nor the path you choose
To make all your dreams come true,
I want you to know, wherever you go,
My love and best wishes are with you.
Yours,
Ruthie

SEES ALL, HEARS ALL

IRVING ASH

HOLD on to your hats, folks! Crash! Bang! Zowie (and stuff)! Do you feel like Buck Rogers? You are now on a Time Traveler going into the future. We will see what happens as the girls continue what they have started this term and rapidly take over the school. On and on into the future we go; silence periods are cut out of the lunchroom, strawberry ice cream is served, dressing periods are lengthened but still we travel on. We even go past the time when we get an athletic field before we come to a stop. We sneak up on a group of girls talking in the rear campus.

Frances Freshman: Jamaica hasn't a chance tomorrow. Did you see those long kicks Mary was getting off this afternoon? And with Margaret carrying the ball, the game's ours.

Sally Senior: And didn't Rosalyn look just too, too divine in that helmet with the off-the-face brim and that lovely feather on top. And aren't those new cleats with the sandal front to match the jerseys just too ducky?

Sadie Sophomore: Oh, I'll bet that Jamaica team will just die of jealousy. They have to wear their last year's uniforms with those out of date helmets that come with veils.

Jeanne Junior: But did you hear what our coach said. Grace wouldn't play tomorrow unless they use a blue football to match her football gloves!

ADVICE

Rush into locker room—work combination on lock—nothing happens—

EIGHTY-FIVE

try different combination — nothing happens—kick lock—feller with major A walks up and kicks you—realize you're in wrong row—put on gym suit and get dressed—dash into assembly as Mr. Clarke is beginning his address—have suspicious feeling he is looking at you—he is—sit down in your seat—notice that your right arm is paralyzed and cannot be moved—see that your elbow is in the center of a hunk of chewing gum—remove gum with your left hand—remove gum from left hand with right shoe—remove gum from right shoe with left heel—notice that Macbeth has become involved in the gum—bend over to give Macbeth a hand—hand is felt on left shoulder—hand belongs to teacher—relax and watch show leaving Macbeth to take care of himself.

FOND OF MEMORY

At this time of year my heart bleeds for them gazing at me through their battered and torn faces. These martyrs to the cause of education never ask questions while being battered around—theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do and die (sniff), they go through everything including hail, but end up in the garbage pail. I can't help it folks—I feel it coming on, my periodic attack—here it is—

POEM OF THE MONTH

Our notebooks labor hard and long,
When new we bought them for a song,
We carry them thru rain and sleet,
At times we use them for a seat,
They do not like this, I do know,
A little birdie told me so.
Oh, notebook, oh notebook, it is for you we mourn,
Astanding there with pages atattered and atorn.

CLASS NIGHT INTERVIEWS

Below we present some candid interviews that were gained as the class first nighter audience filed out of the theatre. They are guaranteed to be unrehearsed and are entirely spontaneous (wrap your tongue around that).

Q. How did you enjoy the Class Night Show?

A. What show? I sat in front of a lady, with a hat on.

Q. Say, freshman, how did you get in here?

A. I carried a piece of music for the orchestra and walked in.

Q. How did you like the show?

A. Oh, I didn't come to see the show. I just came along to heckle my big brother.

Q. Say, bud, what did you think of the performance?

A. It was stupendous, colossal. In fact, there are very few performances on the professional stage that equaled

it. By the way, how did you like the solo I sang.

SPLASH!

Now that summer is practically upon us, we strongly recommend that you get in condition for the swimming season. This conditioning course involves some difficulty and sacrifice on your part, however. In order to get in proper condition—it pains me to say this—it will be absolutely necessary that you take a—bath! Quite a shock but anything to get in condition. Before getting into a tub, fill mouth with salted crackers. Get into tub and place head under water and whistle two choruses of the Adams Clipper. This will develop your wind. Next pull plug from tub and battle the tide as the water goes down the drain. If you lose and go down with the water, it means that you wouldn't have been such a hot swimmer anyway.

JOB JABBER

Before beginning your job hunting go into training for two weeks doing three miles every morning and boxing three snappy rounds with your shadow every night. Now you're all set.

As soon as the paper comes in the morning, tear it all apart before anyone reads it and start out with your pockets full of want-ads. Find address on want-ad. Walk up nine flights of stairs. Turn left. Turn right. Open door marked private and walk in.

Quickly open door marked private and walk out. Turn left. Turn right. Walk down eight and one-half flights of stairs (missed the last seven steps, a flying start). Step outside and look up next address on want-ad list.

THE DAWN'S EARLY LIGHT

THE sun filtered through the ancient gratings of the window and settled in rosy flecks upon the heavy velvet drapes. A shadow slowly emerged and gazed with unseeing eyes upon the motley collection of giant boulders that clung around the foot of the castle and the dwarfed herbage that stretched out into endless plains.

Don Alvaro de Luna was a handsome man. As the beams of light played about his face, sharp distinct features were visible. His chin was molded on fine Grecian lines, a classic in strength and character. Flowing lines continued in tracing cruel lips bordered by an ingeniously curled mustache. An adorable asset according to the ladies of King Juan of Spain's court. It was so roguish, so carefree. The eyes. There beauty stopped and dominance prevailed. Lean, he was splendid in the choicest and rarest of silks. He heard a shuffling of papers and a sigh. The prince turned with a casual disrespect and regarded the King, his brother, musingly.

King Juan was older than Don Alvaro but he was much slighter and seemed younger in a pitiful sort of way. He was softer-spoken and his eyes were tired looking. His Majesty was still in mourning for his Queen Maria who had died mysteriously after taking some "herbs". Enemies of Don Alvaro retained very private opinions.

Don Alvaro spoke.

JENNIE
RADUS

"Your majesty as to your forthcoming marriage," he hinted broadly.

"Ah, yes, Don Alvaro, my choice falls upon Fregonde, daughter of Charles VII of France. A member from the French Court, the change . . . "

"Your Majesty," Don Alvaro smiled, "the young Princess Isabel, first cousin of King Alfonso V of Portugal is a charming child."

Consequently a few months later in the year 1458 a slender princess of Portugal was magnificently welcomed into Spain. Isabel was clever for her years. She realized that she was not meant to be the pliant instrument for the dominance of the king, because Alvaro already had the king under his influence. But, she, Isabel, had a strong ally in the powerful Portugal. Perhaps Alvaro wished to be king in reality. Kill the King and with her aid subdue the people of Spain. Therefore when he gave her his most disarming smile, she returned it with one as charming. Isabel interpreted his every move correctly. Bitterly and ingeniously she invented glances and rehearsed smiles which she could wear without losing the hatred in her heart.

Each parried and fenced with dances and polite phrases and exchanged clever verbal incisions, each bent on the destruction of the other..

The beautiful old stones in the corridors formed a protecting arch over the calm and reposeful head of Isabel as she found her way through the maze of passages. The Queen was almost joyous. As she neared the ballroom, significant and gloating glances were exchanged, and many were in the direction of Don Alvaro. Here was the cause of his decreasing power.

He rose more irritated than he cared to admit. He strolled about exchanging a word here and there, gnawing his mustache, attempting vainly to regain his composure. Realizing his dimming powers, he lioned up and down until he again saw Don Pedro. Where he was, there was that young upstart glaring at him, mocking him. The fool belonged to the retinue of Queen Isabel. The desperate hate that was in him attached itself to Don Pedro. Belonged to Queen Isabel, did he? He'd demand an explanation.

One word led to another, and the two men rushed upon each other in a fury. Swords clashed and the women screamed. Don Alvaro was a famed blade yet it required all his skill to check his adversary. The energetic young noble hopped, skipped, lunged and parried. He attacked on all sides. Yet he fought like a man who had great respect for his own epidermis. De Luna drew first blood. Don Pedro's ire was rising and he fought with greater fervor. He had Don Alvaro swiftly retreating under the fierce onslaught of his blows. Alvaro was steadily beaten back. The expression on De Luna's face became terrible. Desperate! He was breathing heavily. Warding off the blows weakly, he began to fence with all his cunning. Finally De Luna dropped to one knee and remained there, kneeling in token of defeat. Don Pedro lowered his blade. Suddenly with a deft movement, Don Alvaro's sword snaked forward darting into the unguarded breast of Don Pedro. He fell like an inert lump of sodden clay.

De Luna arose smiling, those black eyes mockingly surveying the horror-stricken audience. He looked about as if expecting the dance to begin, but no one stirred. All eyes turned to Queen Isabel. Her Majesty sat tight lipped and white but with a terrible joy shining her triumph. He had made the mistake. The one mistake.

She smiled slowly. De Luna stirred uneasily. Visions passed before his eyes. He could see himself in prison. Waiting. Hoping. What nonsense is this? He was soft. Was he not the King's brother? What harm could come to him? A mere servant's death could not jeopardize his position. But he was in the queen's service. The Queen! He stared at her. Things happened so slowly. Was life suspended? She was still smiling. Yes, the queen was smiling but with her lips; the eyes were grim and cold. De Luna shivered and his heart beat so loudly he pressed his hand to hush it.

But the sound grew louder and louder. It seemed to reach through the room. Surely everyone must hear it. I am a coward. Bravely, does it. He straightened and smiled.

Her majesty knew the King was troubled. She saw how his eyes followed De Luna after court was dismissed. The man was his brother but the King would not deny her what she wished.

One thing alone frightened her. She might destroy the King's love for her together with De Luna. No. The King could be influenced. He would not aid a murderer. The populace despised De Luna also. She could see him mount the scaffold, feeling all the pangs of remorse and dread as fear wracked his body, his mind a searing place of fire. She could see him dying with every step he took.

All these hopes were so many sweet thoughts for her majesty; so, rocked by them, she fell asleep.

Ragged clouds drifted. Gathered in the distance as if an unseen shepherd sat there calling together his flock of gray-white sheep. The moon was almost at the full, shedding its rays over the bare mountain sides, over the vast city and into the dim recesses of a cell. Unbelievably pure and beautiful. And a man stood there and disbelieved and thought again on what the day would bring. Would she—?

He would not feel the headman's axe. Not now or ever. The King would not forget him. His own brother. And yet! His white fingers clenched, an amethyst gleaming mysteriously. He twisted the ring nervously in twitching fingers. Aware of the precious stone, he tore it off and flung it with panicky strength into the darkness. The token rolled and gleamed and seemed to seek him with all its brilliancy. The white fingers moved backward and forward, knitting themselves in distraction, then finally, gradually, they became calm and for the first time in their life they were laid in the attitude of prayer. They begged! What would happen tomorrow? Would the woman forgive?

The Wallflower

I go to many parties,
Gatherings, and such,
But I don't seem to make a hit—
At least not very much.

I always am most active
At each and every ball,
I always do my very best
To help hold up the wall.

I sit primly in a corner,
And watch with saddened heart
The dancing and the playing,
In which I never take a part.

But I shall keep on trying,
Some day I'm sure to shine—
And maybe never have to watch
The others, while I pine.

Indian Red

The dying embers glow
With soft and feeble spark
They dance and leap and glow
Then fade into the dark.

Bronze bodies glistening
Under a rosy harvest moon,
Erect figures listening
To the waves crash near the dune.

Life flowing from the torn
Throat of the wounded doe,
That here quivering, spent and worn
Has turned to face her foe.

The pungent tang of burning leaves
With colors bright and gay
That shaken from the wind-swept trees
Have fallen here this day.

Drying corn and apples red
Strung below the eaves,
Row on row of swelling gourds
Among the corn in sheaves.

Indian red upon the hearth,
Indian red from hidden rafter,
Indian red in stirring leaves,
Indian red in Nature's laughter.

ON BOYCOTTS

DOROTHY PLEAU

THERE are some folks who would like to boycott certain nations, but why them? After all charity begins at home. Let's have our boycott committee get busy on the movies. Through the use of the noble boycott, we must strive to eliminate or at least reduce the following bits of outworn conversation in motion pictures:

"Someone in this room is guilty, and I'm going to find out who it is." "I wonder why he is so anxious to buy the place." "Yes, boys, we finally got the Red Rustler. 'Thar' he hangs dead on that limb. As sheriff of Sunset Gap, I hated my duty because he was my—my brother!" "Sorry, Inspector, but I won't be able to help Scotland Yard this time. I'm going on my vacation. H'm it does sound interesting. Meet you in the morgue in five minutes." "Suicide? Sa-ay, it looks like cold-blooded murder to me." "Have your men surrounded the place?" Also "After him men!" and "Follow that car!"

Now for some bromide situations. First there is the good old newspaper plot which runs like this:

Hardboiled Editor Matrix doesn't believe in women reporters although all the other papers have them. Pretty Sally Filmsy begs and begs for Murder Case, she outscopes Scoop a job and gets it. On the Tarantula is "Scoop" Fudge, star reporter, who is always getting fired and rehired. Scoop, old boy, gets really angry when she again scoops him in The Lady Cavendish Trial. Scoopy realizes that the family name of Fudge is being disgraced so he marries Sally, and they cover their beats together. Matrix would give them a three weeks' vacation with pay, only he needs them for the Armchair Killing.

We also want our boycotting league to take some drastic steps concerning the cowboy film or "horse-opera". Below we have a typical version.

Last Saturday, Donald Brook, the refreshing hero of that charming serial "El Lobo of the Plains", was buried beneath the mountainside when the dynamite exploded. This Saturday will show Donald sitting on top of the mountain with a big grin on his face. The chapter will end with Donald tied to a stake surrounded by a circle of blazing fagots. On the Saturday after this Saturday, Donald will whistle to his horse who will untie him. In later chapters Donald will fight fifteen men unaided, rush into the burning ranch house to save Molly, capture "Mephistopheles", "Al Shai-tan", "Moloch", "Belga" and "The Terror", and prove that Sheriff Johnson is really "El Lobo".

The jungle tale below must also go the way of all things that our Boycott Organization doesn't stamp with approval. This one is called "Buried Ivory" (and a number of other things).

The scene opens with Miss Jean Larsen and her papa trudging gayly through the heavy undergrowth of the jungle. Then you see something moving in the shrubbery. Then you see an arrow. Then you see the arrow in Mr. Larsen's body. Then you see Mr. Larsen hand the map, revealing the location of the elephants' burial ground, to Jean. Then you see Mr. Larsen die. Now, unless you are asleep, you will realize that Jean is lost in the jungle; yes, lost in the dark mys-ter-i-ous jungle.

"Waa Haa Woo Joo", this strange cry frightens little Jeanie. Then, with a long graceful swing, out of the tree tops her rescuer comes—Zantar, king of the monkeys (he looks it too). Zantar can talk only tiger talk and monkey talk, but Jean teaches him English. The next day, he speaks it fluently. They become friends, united against Spider Webb and his gang of cutthroats who are after the treasure. These men are real bad men. They carry guns and everything. They don't play fair and square like Jean and Zantar. Their souls are as black as a pair of white gym sneakers.

We want our Boycott Association to take notes on the following:

INTERESTING FACTS—The hero is versatile. He can build a raft, climb a palm tree, decipher codes and fly a plane, but the villain can't even swim. All murders are committed at night. Midnight is the preferable hour, London is the preferable place, and a thick fog is the preferable atmospheric condition. Those half-breed trappers sure are rascals in the Royal Mounted Films. When the heroine tells the hero over and over again, "I hate you, I despise you, I loathe you, I detest you, I abhor you and I don't like you," then you know that the clever "surprise" ending will be that she becomes madly in love with him. Those desert pictures aren't so good either; a man and a girl dying of thirst, but only the girl is thirsty.

When seeing a baseball picture, don't worry about the ace hitter even if his disappearance has alarmed his fellow players. He is sure to show up at the last inning of the big game when the score is 26-3 in favor of the other team.

A western picture cannot end unless there is a beautiful sunset for the hero and heroine to ride towards.

A handsome bandit who besides robbing stage coaches, steals kisses and locks of hair, is either trying to find out who murdered his brother, Jack, or else he is going to be completely reformed before the picture ends.

It is amazing how much a telegram saying, "I love you," will do towards winning a big boxing final.

*Lots of fun
of a real athlete
Paul Miller*

SPORTS CASTING

PAUL MILLER

IN THIS modern day and age everything is affected by the quest for speed that has seemingly become an obsession to the world at large. Nothing seems to have evaded the grasp of King Speed. Planes are built that can fly faster; boats are built that can skim over the briny deep at a terrific rate of speed; even the automobile, a mechanism that has become a part of our everyday life, is now capable of much greater speeds, and now the all-powerful impulse of speed has extended into athletics.

Take football for instance. Previous to the reign of Speed, a football team was composed of the biggest, strongest, heaviest bruisers a coach could get his hands on. All that was required in order for a fellow to play in the backfield of his high school football team was a "fair to middlin'" amount of brains and the rest sheer brawn. Then out of a clear sky came fellows like Coach Andy Kerr of Colgate who established the "razzle-dazzle" or "hipper-dipper" style of play.

The rest of the teams, at least those who were still using the old style of play, were taken aback by this revolutionary change. The big sluggish type of player they had on their teams were of no use against the light, fast, shifty player that had now come into vogue.

The change in the style of play can even be noted when we compare Adams Championship team of last year with the teams Adams put on the field earlier in its football history.

Remember the team of Al Guthy, Jim Goley, Abe "Primo" Simon, the Marino brothers, "Stretch" Wiechert, Andy Tammara, and Geny McCarthy and then compare the weight average of that team with last year's version and you'll find that the former averaged at least 25 pounds more.

The tactics used by the two teams were also entirely different to say the least. When the old team of Guthy, Goley, etc., wanted to make a first down, with a few yards to go, they would probably pull Simon back from the line and let him try to plunge over to pick up the few yards needed. But not last year's team. In such a case either Tommy Carbone would take the ball and race, swiftly as a gazelle, around end, or Armand Prusmack would shoot one of his beautiful passes to the speedy Tommy. Whatever play was called, it required speed, precision, and coordination, not power.

Basketball was always considered a fast game and one not exceptionally easy to follow, but after the new ruling that eliminates the center tap it has become one of the fastest games played today.

Before that ruling went into effect a basketball coach could usually get along pretty well with five regulars and two substitutes and, barring injuries, the substitutes seldom broke into the lineup. However, now it is almost absolutely necessary for a basketball coach to have at least ten boys capable of playing good ball.

Especially is this true in high school, since young fellows who are really not out of the stages of development, are not capable of answering completely the speed demands of the game. The game progresses so swiftly that it is really a first class job to keep score. If you take your eyes off the game for a minute, you may miss a good deal of scoring.

Basketball, as it is played now, will sound the death knell of the tall, slim, ungainly player who used to form the nucleus of the basketball team. Such a player would be almost totally lost in the present style of play. The compact, shifty, durable player is the order of the day.

In track, Speed is now written with an even larger capital S. Of course it has always been the object of a runner to lower the record of the particular event in which he participates, but now science has stepped in to take charge.

The track marks that were set by such great runners as Wyckoff and Nurmi have been shattered and reshattered until the old standards are no longer recognizable. Jesse Owens and Bob Johnson, the two chocolate-colored speed merchants, run the century at a pace that practically puts Wyckoff's previous mark to shame and Glenn Cunningham and Archie San Romani are doing their part to eclipse Paavo Nurmi's former record. Does this mean better athletes are being born to the world or does it indicate that some influences other than natural ones are at work?

It seems to us that the latter may be the case for Darwin's theory of Evolution has not had a chance to go into effect since Nurmi and Wyckoff pounded the cinders.

Today a first class runner is treated like a piece of valuable machinery. His diet is scientifically perfect; his training is supervised by experts, in fact, everything he does is controlled by scientific methods. Tracks are prepared and graded so that they can be traversed more swiftly.

However, there is one consoling thought. It all has to stop somewhere, for the human body can stand just so much until Speed demands more than can be physically given.

SHIP'S LIBRARY

FLORENCE GILDAY

GROTESQUE forms and terrific shrieks fill the pages of Edgar Allan Poe's fantastic tales. As one reads, he trembles when the black cat stalks across the pages, and draws back in horror at the swinging of the pendulum as it comes nearer and ever nearer to the heart of the victim. Nothing could be more gruesome than these stories or more fascinating. Once begun, they cannot be laid aside until finished. These stories are not advised for people with weak hearts who might take to reading them on a dark and stormy night, for the insistent and sudden ringing of a doorbell, the yell of an alley cat or the shrill shriek of the wind may cause the reader's flesh to creep and, while his hair stands on end, call for help to no avail. But to the stout-hearted and the bold, here is the treat of treats.

One of the most gallant novels of the loves of two Americans in the Orient ever written is "Oil For The Lamps of China," by Alice Tisdale Hobart. Against the vivid background of the changeless East unfolds this tale of young life and its struggle for security, happiness and everlasting peace.

"Madame Curie," by Eve Curie, is a biographical story of a woman of courage and perseverance. This story will make you marvel at the strength and the unconquerable spirit of this woman chemist while at work on an idea to benefit all mankind. Her struggle for existence, the many obstacles that stood in her path and the indomitable manner in which she solved her every problem will tend to make you respect her all the more. It is the story of a great person, a figure best representative of womankind and her virtues. And she gave to the world the knowledge of radium.

Another interesting biography is called "An Adventure With a Genius" by Alleyne Ireland. This biography concerns a very eccentric and famous personage, Joseph Pulitzer, owner of the famous New York World. Pulitzer was struck blind in mid-career and rebuilt his life with the eyesight and brains of other men. This unique story is assembled from all over the world, which he bullied, aggravated, and cruelly drove to the limit of its power.

John Ruskin's advice to book enthusiasts was that they should get at the author's meaning of the book and not use their own opinions, unless they were qualified to do so.

This is sound advice for it will inevitably lead to a better understanding of literature.

Question: What do you intend to do after you graduate from John Adams High School?

Leo Hamalian: I have hopes of going to the University of Wisconsin or some other college outside of New York where I can take Journalism. After that I want to get a job as a reporter.

Albert Messer: I expect to go to New York University where I'll take up dentistry. If any of the students have any teeth to be pulled, just tell them to save them for a few years.

Thomas Carbone: I've accepted an offer for a scholarship from the Iowa State Teacher's College. I hope to play some football and try out for the track team.

Tony Parpan: I've been presented with a scholarship from Villanova. I'll try out for the basketball team. I hope I can make out as well as Duke Duzminski has.

Mildred Cleary: I may go to Queens College and take up a Bachelor of Science course.

John Brennan: I'm going to Queens College for a Bachelor of Arts degree. So far, I haven't made any definite plans about doing any work in the field of art.

Gloria Washburn: I'm going to the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. Of course I'm going to take dramatics! After that? Maybe I'll make Broadway someday.

William Sheffield: I am going to the University of Alabama. I will study teaching, most likely. I hope to come back to Adams to teach some day.

ROVING SEAMEN

IRVING GRUBER

Emma Di Filippo: The Kathryn Gibbs Business College is where I'm going to go. I want to work in an office at a reasonable salary.

Robert Klenck: Well, I'm going to the School of Journalism at the University of Wisconsin. After that, I'll hit the road and try to obtain a reporter's job.

Robert Lindstrom: If I go to college, I'll go to Hofstra or to Iowa State Teachers. What I'll do after that is just as much of a mystery to me as it is to you.

Dorothy Schilling: As soon as I graduate, I'm going to start looking for a job. I hope to obtain a position as a secretary.

Louis Dougherty: I don't know. Most likely, I'll go to college.

INTO THE SCUPPERS

IRVING ASH

THE world is moving rapidly (compliments of Physiography 8) and it is about time the problems that are facing us were discussed by an expert, so I might as well begin. First, let's look at Technology—funny looking critter, isn't it? Which brings us to the Sit-Down Strike. Well, that's strike one, but if that hurler grooves another one, he'll drive it out of the lot. Just look at that Giant infield. Let's see now—one-two—why, they got four men out there; how can they lose with a team like that. No, that's four men not counting that man on second. Boy, oh-boy—what a spot, two out and a man on second—what a spot! Now how in the world did those spots get on this page; I didn't write this while I was eating supper. It's probably just spots before my eyes. Looking out in the field we see that the right fielder is playing center. Oh—I get it—it's the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

As proof of this (proof of what?) (You keep out of this!) Well, anyway, as proof of this, we have especially for this occasion someone who really ought to know what he is talking about. None other than Hrishnry Msgreilxz (excuse, please, typographical error) who fought three snappy rounds with a Brooklyn fan every playing day of last season.

He says: "Rookbin harn't oth a hance he hints hill hal awk all oor hem," (sorry, we forgot to mention that he lost most of his teeth in last season's campaign.) Shifting our gaze out to deep right field, we notice the large bleachers. Aha—so that's why so many of the Giant ball players are blonde.

Rebuttal: (Listen, ace, your arguments are so full of holes your page looks like a piece of Swiss Cheese. Twelve trillion eight hundred and seventy-four billion three hundred and sixty-nine million seven hundred and four thousand and three hundred and twenty-six he says, that's a laugh, and what a laugh. (about time we had a laugh in here). Do you think you can get away with that kind of stuff. Suppose there is only 216 more days to Christmas. What then? Do you think that I think that you think. Do you think it's gonna rain? Do you think??? Fie, I say. (Guess that shuts him up.)

Is Technology Around The Corner?
Sit Down Strike As An Instrument of Labor.
The Constitutionality of the Wheeler-Rayburn Public Utilities Holding Act.
How Far Should We Go With Laissez-Faire?
The Relative Efficiency of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

THERE have been 12,874,369,704,326 words, roughly speaking, uttered since last November 19, on the extremely debatable subject of "The Volleyball Situation in the Belgian Congo" and local officials are in somewhat of a dither. It seems that Colonel William "Memphis Bill" Terry, under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is trying to build up his farm system. Terry's proposed plans would feature a system of N. Y. Giants, Jersey City Little Giants and the Congo Itsie-Bitsie Giants. Of course, this situation has its drawbacks.

Drawback No. 1 is the proximity of Technology to being around the corner. Also around the corner is graduation, prosperity, and Tony Mazzoiti's Hot Dog Stand. But we're getting off the scent—The Wheeler-Rayburn Public Utilities Holding Act is no use at all unless you're one of those weak, anemic types of individual who depend on a daily constitutional for substance. And if the Supreme Court declares it unconstitutional, then where are you?

Take the Sit-Down strike for instance as an instrument of Labor. With Labor and Sit Down on one side and Capital and Lower Case on the other, Terry's chances look pretty glum. Even the sportswriters have turned away from him. His crack, now immortal, "Is Brooklyn in the league?" has been paraphrased to "What League?"

OUT OF THE SCUPPERS

ROBERT KLENCK

In rebuttal: My esteemed opponent, who chooses to expound the virtues of the affirmative side on the other page is balmy as a loon. Just look at what he says.

I quote: "Technology—funny looking critter, isn't it?" He should talk. He's got a face (roughly speaking again) that would stop an Anschluss.

I sneer at his supercilious observations concerning the relative efficiency of the SEC. I sneer at his passive Laissez-Faire. I sneer wholeheartedly and contemptuously. If we had pretzels, we'd have sneer and pretzels.

RETURN VOYAGE

LOIS ROSS

WHAT happens to those lucky individuals who finally graduate? Do they continue in the field in which they were prominent during their school days?

Elisa Proley, class of June '36, who was active in every sport and star player in all games, is attending Hunter College and holds the position of manager of the Varsity Basketball Team.

Ann Feinstein, June '36, girls' sports reporter on the Campus, is studying Physical Education at New York University and besides being a cheer leader, she is a reporter on the department newspaper. With all this she found time to partake in the demonstration held several weeks ago on athletics and modern dancing.

Celestine Kaupp, January '37, first secretary of the Girls' Athletic Association, is employed as a comptometer operator.

Two boys who were exceedingly outstanding in art are Stanley Kalinowski, who is working with a noted artist, Dean Cornwall. The other boy is Frank Napoleon, January '38, one of the best cartoonists Adams ever had. He is learning to do animated cartoons for moving pictures.

Those people with exceptionally good voices, like Anna Dawson, January '35, who starred in alto leads, should continue. Anna is attending Brooklyn College and she has recently sung at Carnegie Hall. In her spare time she does pupil teaching right here in Adams. Ventura Ninivaggi, June '34, took the tenor leads. He is now singing in Philadelphia and New York musical shows and in leading church choirs. He now goes under the name of William Ventura.

Many boys from the orchestra, like Charles Dietz, learned their instruments right here at school. Charles learned to play the French horn and was the first one to play it in John Adams. He was with the Portland, Oregon, Symphony Orchestra. Charles is married and the proud father of a baby girl.

Ferdinand Perrone, June '35, who sang in operettas, is now studying with a famous teacher.

Morris Rosenberg hitch-hiked 1300 miles to Iowa City, which, incidentally, is in Iowa, where he is attending the University of (you guessed it) Iowa!

This group of Alumni seems to be making quite a success of their lives.

What will be the fate of this term's graduates?
